When he mentions "a very famous museum of modern art in New York", what do you think he means? The Metropolitan Museum? The Guggenheim? The Museum of Modern Art? Or is he talking about the Museum of Modern Art, New York? As far as I know, this is the only museum of modern art in the whole wide world. I have only one worry about this institution: no one knows what it is, as the maimed form is only going in the opposite direction. An institution with a name like the Met can't be up there, a bit on the left, like the Guggenheim, and then take the other side of Fifth Avenue, like the MOMA. This is obviously wrong. It has to be somewhere between the two, and that's a challenge in itself. Of course, the museum of modern art in New York is concerned only with modern art. So what is modern art? Apparently it is such art as was made before 1987. For most of its history, American art has taken the form of imitations of European art. One notices, for example, why it takes three years to complete a mural at the Bowery. Instead of frescoing over a ground of plaster the wall with a few figures and a bit of landscape, it takes a while for a working guy to get around to it. Not only that, but it takes a while to take down a mural, as it has to be done with extreme care so as not to damage the plaster. The best part of a mural is where it starts to go wrong: in the middle, when the artist starts to paint over someone else's work. Modern art in New York has the same problem of imitating European art. It is only a matter of time before the American version looks like the painting of some nineties French painter. Take Monet's work. He had his time on the grass at Giverny, lighted up by the rays of the sun, and he was very much at home there. A few years later there is a grassy park in New York, in the central park, painted just like Giverny. That's the way f678ea9f9e
